Week 6 CSS

Reflection

In this assignment, I improved my Brian's Coffee Shop website by applying different CSS selectors and styling techniques. The class selector was the most useful because it allowed me to apply the same styling to multiple elements. For example, I used the highlight class to emphasize important information on different pages.

I learned that margins and padding serve different purposes. Margins create space outside an element, while padding creates space inside an element. Understanding this difference helped me organize my website more effectively.

The CSS box model helped me improve the appearance of my website by controlling content, padding, borders, and margins. I used the properties to create better spacing and make the pages easier to read.

I also learned how CSS specificity works. For example, a class selector can override an element selector when both rules apply to the same property because the class selector has higher specificity.

The most important improvement was centering images and the captions, organizing the navigation links, and applying consistent colors throughout the website. These changes made Brian's Coffee Shop more attractive, organized, and user-friendly
